

ISN'T CONSORTING WITH DEMONS EVIL?

2020

Every single thought that passes through your head is represented on the astral plane. It's just that the existence of those entities or objects is just as fleeting as your thoughts about them. Without another consciousness to hold them into existence, they blink out just as quickly as they blinked in. But it's important to note the mechanism at work and that it applies at all points along the scale.

Moving on to the more interesting bits... any idea, concept, or image that is known to more than one person can be said to be represented in the collective (un)consciousness. Such things (and in the astral ideas are things) are accessible by anyone else on Earth since we all participate in the same collective (un)consciousness (whether it's "consciousness" or "unconsciousness" is a subject for another day).

I tested this once with an evocation of Santa Claus. It worked, but was rather underwhelming. It turns out that icons like that are very two-dimensional, which isn't particularly surprising when you think about it.

But another type of egregore is the one that is created incidentally by all of us just by our existence. Keeping in mind that the concept must be shared by more than one person in order to take on a life of its own (there is one notable exception to this rule... but again, another day) then what others think about you is also an egregore.

This is interesting because I didn't say that who you really are is an egregore. It's the person others think you are that fuels the egregore. And if other people have wildly different impressions of you, it can make for a rather bizarre type of astral entity. This is why consistency, openness, and honesty in one's life is always recommended.

Like your fleeting thoughts, such egregores also have a lifespan. It's literally that they live until the last living person who was aware of their existence dies. I'm not saying that there's no possibility of consciousness in the afterlife. But the knowledge of that egregore is in your brain and when you die, your brain is worm food. So yes, you do persist after death, but with massive amnesia about your life in this world. But I digress...

There's a famous example of this effect in action. Alphonse Louis Constant (aka Eliphas Levi) performed an evocation of Apollonius of Tyana who lived approximately 2100 years prior. So then the question presents itself: What was it that he really evoked? Assuming that reincarnation is a thing (as most serious occultists do... not to mention Buddhists), his spirit most certainly has reincarnated many times since he went by that name. What Constant evoked wasn't the actual spirit of Apollonius, but rather the egregore comprised of other people's impressions of him. It has survived this long literally because his legacy has lived on this long. If it hadn't, how would Constant have known to evoke him? Long story short, Apollonius offered a massive "download" of information to Constant which took him weeks to go through. But once he did, he wrote it all down and published it under the title: “Rituel et Dogma de la Haut Magie” or as we know it in English “Transcendental Magic”.

And there is another type of egregore: The ancient ones. These egregores were created at the same time as the concept of consciousness met the soil of Earth. Babalon, for example, is one of these extremely old entities. There aren’t many of them, though I never stopped to actually catalog them. But each goes by many names and many faces. These egregores are unique in that they don’t require anyone to be aware of them. They were born with this world and they will die with it.

Then there is another type of astral entity (I hesitate to call them egregores). These are people who once lived, probably many times, and managed to break free of the cycle of reincarnation by mastering the art of waking within a dream. They awoke within death and chose another path. These people are sometimes referred to as the Secret Masters. I call them The Watchers. They are very reclusive, but they watch everything that goes on. It’s not hard to spot them during an AP session. They’ll usually be found hiding clumsily behind a piece of furniture or a phone booth or whatever in a rather comic book fashion. But getting them to talk to you is another matter. When they’re ready to talk, they’ll let you know.
