

YOU'RE ALL INSANE!

2025

Reflecting on the "not all women/men" trope, it occurred to me that the behavior of any sufficiently large grouping of humans, when considered as a whole, can always be justifiably described as insane. Therefore, humanity, as a whole, is insane.

Therefore, the only hope for sanity lies in making many divisions into small groups.

But small groups of humans are known as tribes. Tribes result in conflicts and war, which can also be considered insane.

Therefore, humans can only exist in small tribes where they are incapable of encountering one another, perhaps by way of some impenetrable barrier.

... like outer space, for example.

Just as a thought experiment: Consider the possibility of the existence of a human super-species that broke itself apart for this reason and planted small colonies of itself on different planets in the hope of being able to act in a sane way. Now consider that super-species is the mind of God, fragmented not for the purpose of self-knowledge, but for the pursuit of sanity.

GROUP DYNAMICS

Let's examine the dynamics of small and large groups of people in more detail. If you're the type who needs everything quantifiably defined, then let's call any group of less than 200 people, "small". A large group of people will be over 10,000. And medium would be anything in between.

Every study that's ever been done on the subject of large group dynamics will tell you that small groups are the way to go. They're more efficient, make better decisions, and have fewer interpersonal issues. This does come with a warning about the importance of DEI and ensuring that an adequately diverse population is represented in order to avoid falling victim to traps such as echo chambers, cults of personality, and tunnel vision.

"OK, theory and psychobabble, blah, blah, blah. What are you getting at?"

Are you still wondering why human relationships are so dysfunctional these days?

Because the Internet - social media in particular - have made everyone a member of a huge group of people. And that's so much worse than simply causing the group to act irrationally as a whole.

As a member of a large group, you will find yourself having to act irrationally as you're pulled this way and that from one schizophrenic group consensus position to another. So, it's not like you get to claim personal sanity while simultaneously conceding that the group you are a part of is insane.

But it gets worse. The larger the group you're in, the less impact your voice and your contributions have on the group's opinions, direction, and products. As your contributions are diminished, so are you in the eyes of other members.

For example, you may have a lot of value within the group of tennis-playing women with red hair in New Jersey. But when lumped into the group of "all women on planet Earth, your individual value is dramatically lower.

At least when we're talking about social media, group membership is intentional and voluntary. But in general society, other people get to choose which groups you're a member of (often based purely on appearance!)

As an even more visceral example of this, here is the advice I always offer to transgender women who ask me what I think⁶³ about the subject of "bottom surgery".

"You are currently a member of a relatively tiny group of humans, so you necessarily carry a lot of value within that community and among the people adjacent to that community. While there are some stunningly beautiful trans-women out there, the bar is still artificially low to be considered beautiful within that group and thus piles of admiration and adoring fanfare⁶⁴ is realistically accessible to anyone willing to put in the effort.

⁶³ Yes, this happens from time to time

⁶⁴ Assuming that's something you want. It was really just an example of any kind of social support.

"Also, while I fully appreciate that there are many more factors at play in this decision than just social strategy, you should be prepared for the shock of being moved from your very tiny pond into the ocean called "women". The competition is ridiculously fierce and you're at a genetic disadvantage. Talk to some women who have made the transition first to make sure you can handle the social devaluation that comes along with that move."

DISTORTION

But it gets worse. As the Internet has opened up all of our tiny ponds and made them oceans, we become subject to a weird kind of selection bias. The overwhelming majority of humans have a morbid fascination with pain and suffering. This is why bad news travels at the speed of light and reputations take years to establish and just minutes to destroy.

Now offer everyone a bullhorn and what do you think they're going to say? Considering also that most people are enamored with the idea of being popular.⁶⁵ People will say what others want to hear ...in exactly the same way that this book doesn't. So, in a sense, it creates a particularly perverted sort of tunnel vision or groupthink where the mind starts to believe that the world is far more dangerous than it really is.

THE GENDER WAR

The most obvious example I can think of is women fearing men despite the statistics being quite clear that your odds of being harmed on a date are minuscule. And if it does happen, you have an entire Army standing behind you that will ensure that guy never makes that mistake again.. Nonetheless, many women, consciously or not, treat men like criminal suspects by default until they are able to somehow prove otherwise. ⁶⁶

Ironically, women are espousing this position left and right while in reality the tables have turned to such an extent that men are beginning to realize that they have just as much if not more reason to fear women.

This is how the typical back-and-forth of these things goes. Women fear men, so they react to that fear by doing things they believe will minimize their risk. However, those things end up causing new problems and end up creating a fear in men. Men now fear women, so they react to that fear by doing things they believe will minimize their risk. However...

But how did this start? Women's fears are fundamentally fueled by their own sense of helplessness. The reasons for feeling helpless can vary, but nearly all women are affected by it either due to physical differences⁶⁷ between men and women or from social conditioning coming from any number of sources. Men, on the other hand, are conditioned to believe that they can handle any situation that may arise. This can sometimes even have the opposite effect of causing men to not being afraid when they really should be.

But it gets worse...

So we have these artificially large groupings of people that cohere as the Internet makes the world ever smaller. They are accosted with the examples of the very worst behavior of members of the other group, causing them to overgeneralize and irrationally hate/fear the members of the other group. Because of the enormous size of each group, the individual members are necessarily devalued to the point that they are considered identical and interchangeable.

⁶⁶ This is impossible because the premise is based in emotions, not facts. Therefore, no amount of facts will have any effect.

⁶⁷ Despite the fact that this doesn't actually matter at all in a world with guns.

That's why men lie to women. They know that if they admit to even the tiniest thing being wrong with them - in her opinion - they're no longer under consideration to be that woman's partner. Because why, with 4 billion men in the world, should she have to settle for anything less than perfection (however she chooses to define that)?

And so too goes our ability to authentically relate to one another. And empathy? What's the point? Just get a new one!

So, if that's our present reality, surely the future must be brighter!

Yeah... About that... This is a destructive cycle occurring on a massive scale. And the stakes are high. So you would be wise to predict that it will resolve itself. But the exact means of that resolution are unknown.

This is because most humans require companionship and need a partner to help them get through life. The inability to sustain that as a cultural norm is devastating, not just emotionally but practically as well.

When people attempt a relationship with fear in their hearts, they cannot bond properly because they can never trust their partner enough to devote themselves fully to the relationship. It's impossible to sustain a relationship with one foot out the door (i.e. preparing for a breakup), that will surely become a self-fulfilling prophesy!

Over time, this will manifest as a deep-seated resentment on both sides and eventually men will stop playing nice and subjugate women

(again) on the premise, “we tried equality; it didn’t work.”

CONCLUSION

Sanity is a localized phenomenon.

What can be done to avoid that result?

There is no large-scale solution coming.

No policy, platform tweak, cultural reset, or “conversation” is going to restore sanity at the level of billions of people. Large systems do not become sane. They become statistically predictable, emotionally distorted, and morally indifferent. That is not a failure of ideology; it is a property of scale.

Sanity only exists locally.

It exists between specific people who know one another well enough to stop substituting abstractions for reality.

It exists in relationships where individuals are not interchangeable.

It exists in people who reject fear and suspicion as preconditions to contact.

It exists in spaces small enough that empathy is less risky than contempt.

The Internet did not merely connect us; it abolished the cost of replacing people. Once that happened, authenticity stopped being rewarded, trust stopped being rational, and intimacy became a liability. When everyone is replaceable, no one is worth the risk.

That is the real fracture beneath the gender war:

We have scaled human interaction past the point where human virtues function.

So, what can you do?

You cannot fix the system, but you can refuse to participate in its worst distortions.

You can opt out of treating categories as people.

You can stop borrowing fear from strangers.

You can choose fewer and deeper connections.

You can accept the risk that comes with seeing an individual clearly instead of collapsing a group.

And most importantly, you can recognize this:

Sanity is not a global state to be achieved; it is a fragile agreement maintained between a small number of individuals who are willing to be kind, open, and honest toward one another.

Anything larger than that will eventually go mad.
